

Through the Eyes of the Beholder

As you walk through the garden, draw/write what you see from different points of view.

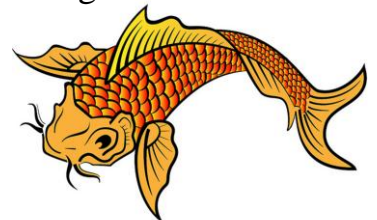

You are a child in a stroller. You are close to the ground. When you look at plants, you see the underside of leaves and how roots grow into the ground. What other things might you notice in the garden? List/draw as many as you can.

You are a hawk circling overhead. Your keen eyes see not only the tops of trees, but also a worm crawling among blades of grass, a mouse rustling in leaves, a lizard climbing the trunk of a tree. What other things might you notice in the garden? List/draw as many as you can.

You are a koi in the pond. You see tadpoles waiting to become frogs and children leaning over the pond to toss in pellets of food. What other things might you notice in the garden? List/draw as many as you can.

You are a lizard. You crawl around plants and up the trunks of trees. Your long, sticky tongue captures insects for lunch. Yum! What other things might you notice in the garden? List/draw as many as you can.

You are a honey bee. Your giant, compound eyes quickly notice the slightest movement and see flowers in very strange ways. As you sip nectar from the flowers you visit, you collect and spread tiny grains of pollen from flower to flower. What other things might you notice in the garden? List/draw as many as you can.
